The willingness to learn new skills is one of the most important qualities that employers are looking for when hiring new employees. To demonstrate your willingness to learn, embrace emerging technology, emphasize your devotion to growth with concrete examples, and ask questions in conversation. Tailor your CV to every job description and include certifications, side projects, statistics, soft and technical skills, and your level of expertise for each skill. When hiring a new employee, employers analyse the applicant's current skills as well as their ability to learn new ones. Growth potential is an important quality in the employee and the willingness to learn shows that ability. According to a study conducted by global recruitment firm Robert Half, 84% of HR managers said their company is open to hiring an employee whose skills can be developed through training. In addition, 62% of employees surveyed said they had been offered a job even if their skills were not inherited with an exact job qualification. Since executives number a great deal of emphasis on employee willingness to learn new skills and grow with the company, the ability to adapt easily to change and take increased responsibility are necessary for career progression. As the importance of these soft skills rises, many job seekers are left wondering: How can I demonstrate my willingness to learn a potential employer? We talked to experts about how best to convey these skills to help you land a job. How to demonstrate your willingness to learn and growA number of ways you can show your employer that you desire and are willing to learn new skills, we have narrowed down the expert proposals to the first five recommendations.1. Give examples of how you self-teaching. Counseling to be a lifelong student may seem a cliché, but it can play a major role in the decision to hire a manager. Ciara Hautau is a senior digital marketing strategist at Fueled, where she is responsible for hiring new team members for her department. She said one of the most important qualities she is looking for in a candidate is the ability to stay on top of trends. This can include simple tasks such as connecting industry-specific newsletters, reading industry blogs and watching video tutorials. You would be surprised how many candidates carry out the tasks assigned to them they are not actively learning on their own, Hautau told Business News Daily. Especially as we are a technology company, tools, industry standards and technologies are constantly changing, and it is important that the employees we hire stay on top of these trends without being asked to do so by managers. However, it is not enough just to stay on top of trends. Paul McDonald, chief executive of Robert Half, said you should prepare concrete examples of how you gain this knowledge. In a past position, are you volunteering for a stretch assignment and achieving great results by pushing you to learn new skills or strategies? Said. Are you a self-taught expert in language coding, or have you been looking for a professional certificate on your own to keep your skills up to date? A handful of anecdotes like these are key to a share in the talks. 2. Highlight your commitment to growth. When you talk about previous work or volunteering experience, you should highlight your participation and the growth you have achieved. Hautau said that rapid promotion in the previous company can say a lot. Even a smaller cover shot demonstrates your ability to adapt quickly and take on new tasks. If you didn't have [the promotion], I'd love to see what you're actively participating in to get you where you want to be, Hautau said. Maybe it's a side hustle and hustle that creates more practice in your skills, or maybe that participation in webinars and community meetups. Show me your participation and enthusiasm beyond your roles in previous companies. 3. Adopt emerging technologies. As many industries center on technology, an important part of modern-day growth involves new technologies as it comes out. McDonald's said job seekers should learn not only about new technologies, but also about its impact on their chosen industry. This shows employers that you are aware of industry trends and influential changing elements. This is especially important for those looking for roles in the technology industry. In addition to reading about new technologies, technology-focused jobseekers can benefit from participating in complementary courses and certifications to gain hands-on experience with the technology. This shows employers that you are willing and able to learn about the desired technology. 4. Explain how your ideas helped the bottom line. So you're dedicated to lifelong learning, great - but how did it benefit your previous employers? Harry Sivanesan, director of sales and business development at recruitment firm ExecuSource, said job seekers should quantify their results if possible. For me, the No 1 thing that sticks out in your resume is how you've helped the bottom line in the past, along with the ideas you've brought to the table that helped you do that, he said. The numbers don't lie! 5. Ask questions in conversation. is two-way experience and jobseekers used as a chance to ask questions. Sivanesan said that asking very thoughtful questions will showcase your willingness to learn during the interview. In addition, it will give you a chance to gain more knowledge about society. You can ask for a company or job description; However, to go the extra mile, ask about the organization's determination to assist with the continued training of employees. This will show that you are interested in continuing your education after you land the job. How to convey your willingness to learn about a CVGithing to the fact that your CV is the first impression of a potential employer, it is important to show not only your current qualifications and skills, but also the motivation to learn new ones. We are currently seeing a trend of companies hiring candidates that are willing to learn because they see this as an opportunity to recruit an employee who is coachable, Sivanesan said. The main goal of your Resume is to show companies how and where you can add value, and companies are starting to value an eager and hungry candidate now more than ever. Hautau shared several key elements that job seekers can include on their CVs to convey their willingness to learn. Software and certifications: Certifications that you have obtained yourself (e.g. google analytics, Google AdWords, Facebook Blueprint) demonstrate your dedication to learning. Side Projects: List side hustles on your resume so employers can see how passionate you are about your industry. Statistics and KPIs: Include statistics on how you used your skills to improve the KPIs of past organizations. In addition to these elements, you can list several specific skills on your resume to show your motivation and eagerness to learn. Select the words of the action that you can support with numbers. Technical and soft skills: McDonald's said it's important to include a balance of technical and soft skills on your resume. Digital transformation is shaping the way we work, and these skills will become increasingly important to organisations. Level of expertise for each skill: In addition to listing skills and certification, McDonald's recommends including your level of expertise for each critical skill set. It can range from beginner to advanced, and it shows your employer where you excel and where you are willing to improve. Customize job description skills: Sivanesan recommends adapting skills to your RESUME to fit the specific job description you're applying for. He said most job descriptions have a preferred qualification section and a minimum requirements section, so you can show your skills accordingly. On your resume, you can also note a brief description of what you learned in your previous roles that you had no prior knowledge of, said Sivanesan. Experts also suggested some key strategies for progress in your career. V it is always useful to show a place to say. Instead of simply saying that you're a dedicated lifelong student, Hautau said, you should show physical examples of how you continue your education, whether it's a personal blog, certification or related webinar. While you may be tempting to stretch the truth in your current progress and education, Sivanesan said it's important to never oversell yourself to an employer. Instead, if you don't know how to do something, express that you want to learn how to do it. A common mistake of an eager candidate is a resumpt, which creates the risk of understudying your new employer, Sivanesan said. Companies are more interested in self-confidence and what you do to develop professionally. If you can show them that you can help yourself, it's a great sign that you'll be able to help them. If you land a job and want to advance within a company, be proactive. McDonald's said demonstrate enthusiasm for educational opportunities and embrace the challenges that come your way. He said staff should try to take on volunteer projects outside the scope of their regular responsibilities. Sivanesan added that the key to any promotion is to do your job before the work is up to you. I've experienced a lot of staff waiting[ing] to be told to take on additional duties without diving and have a positive, hardworking attitude, he said. Being a selfless team player without being told to do so will generate long-term wealth. Wealth.
