Valve's commitment to return in the creation of games begins in earnest November 28, when Artefact comes to Steam, Valve revealed in a press release. The exchange card game, which will be Valve's first game in five years, is set in the world of Dota 2. Upon release, Artifact will be available on PC, Mac, and Linux for $20. A mobile version will reach Android and iOS in 2019. PAX Western participants will have a chance to take Artefact for a spin. It will be Artifact's first public appearance since it was unveiled last August. PAX Western participants will get to take it into a single-disposal glove. Whoever comes forward will end up facing a champion, although we're not sure what that means exactly. PAX West takes place in Seattle from August 31 to September 3. Unfortunately, if you have been itching to play Artefact and do not have tickets already, only September 3 tickets are available at the moment. If you have a chance to play it at PAX West, though, you will get Swag Artefact, including the signed artwork, and two copies of the game when it launches. Valve says the artifact will have the deepest gameplay and the greatest fidelity experience ever in a fantasy card game. This is a bold statement given Hearthstone has dominated the revived genre for years, and Magic: The Gathering constantly holds a loyal user base. Not to mention Gwent, which has bee available in open beta for more than a year. The major concern in squaring off against the likes of Hearthstone and Gwent is that both of them are free-to-play. Will the artifact be able to gain enough traction in a relatively niche genre at its $20 price? It'll be interesting to see. The initial launch will feature 280 cards. Users can buy and sell cards on the Steam Community Market. Earlier this year, Valve co-founder Gabe Newell revealed that Artefact was one of several games the studio works on. So while Artefact may not be on Yours, rest assured, more Valve games are on the way. Editors' Recommendations Even if you're not a fan of the sport, you've probably heard of ESPN.
