Bunny Roo, I Love You by Melissa Marr

I Love You inspired you to write a picture book after many years of writing young adult and middle grade titles? My newborn son, Kaden, was born addicted to several drugs. The head of Bunny Roo, Dr.

Mark Brown, suggested that my voice calmed Kaden, so I should either read or sing to him. When he Bunny Roo enough that I could sit, I wrote or tweaked the words again on that phone. How were your personal experiences I Love You a mother influential in creating this book? I wrote my first novel Wicked Lovely because my daughter wanted a book with specific traits.

Demolition Sally Sutton is a huge win right now. Books that feel good on my tongue end up being the ones I recite in the car or in the store when I need a good distractor. Picture books are a different Bunny Roo from novels.

How did you enjoy seeing your words come to life in the pictures from Teagan White? Teagan is simply brilliant! I could not imagine a better choice of artist, and I was elated that Penguin found her for this project. They sent me various portfolios, but there was no contest. What I wanted was an artist whose work felt like the tone and palate I wanted to convey, and then my goal — and what happened — was to trust her vision.

I think it would be both presumptuous and wrong to give any parent reading advice. Those were my reasons, but the book is very intentionally crafted to put those terms into familiar ones. All babies Bunny Roo hungry, cry, need calming, and so forth. Motherhood, in my opinion, has a universal impulse.

THAT is the biggest message from mom to baby: I am here and yours. Of course, thanks to Teagan anyone could skip every word and just look at the gorgeous pictures! I pre-ordered the board book edition of this for my 3-year-old, although I wondered not having read it yet myself whether it might be too young for him. It wasn't. It wasn't too young for my 8-year-old, either. At the end of our first read, they BOTH let out sighs of deep contentment.

My 3-year-old has asked me to read it to him again and again ever since it arrived, and lots of different bits from the book as the mother tries to guess what kind of animal her new baby is have entered into our family vocab. Keep me warm!
