So often I find myself just rushing through my days, checking off my to-do list, chasing goals, and so busy just trying to get everything done. But this week when I realized that summer was nearly over, it made me really think about how I was spending my time and if I could create more joy and appreciation out of it.

Savouring your time is actually a psychology model that suggests that actively savouring the present moment stretches your experience of time. For example, when you want time to pass quickly, you might wish yourself elsewhere.

When you want to prolong something, you hold yourself right where Savour the Moment are. I started to do some reading on this and thought it was such an interesting concept, finding that the act of simply appreciating the good things in your life can Savour the Moment help you slow down, linger in the Savour the Moment, and ultimately live a happier life.

Try to notice the little things that can make a day special — the smile of a friend, the kindness of a stranger or the beauty of a sunset. We often get so caught up we forget to appreciate the beauty and blessings we have all around us.

When you take time to feel the experience of sound, smells, and sensory details, it helps you live fully in that moment and be present. And with this you can create memories to savour and recall later on.

Savour the Moment thinking about what you appreciate will lighten your life and help you live mindfully. But by actively working to focus on the positive, we can stress less and enjoy life more from a more optimistic vantage point that will lead to Savour the Moment happiness overall.

Stop thinking about your to-do list tomorrow and actually listen when your partner is talking, sip that that morning coffee instead of chugging it down, and eat your food not in front of the television. Savour the moment and enjoy it!

Hopefully enjoyed this post had you a few takeaways to help you savour the moments in your own life and make the most of the rest of the summer! I love this gorgeous look—the colors are so pretty! And these are all great tips for savoring the moment. I could definitely be better about staying present, and I like the idea of focusing on sensations to help. Thanks so much Shealemon!
