You can find all the writing contest stories here. Rumbblings of war amplified across the countryside, but Louis never trusted the rumors his fellow landowners muttered. To lend credence to their exaggerations Tomorrows Promise dramatic discussions annoyed him. Louis nodded, aware of the oppressive competition. Blinded politicians preyed on crop owners with their baseless economic policies. He understood the suffering. The injustice. His own miserly profits had dwindled, making it Tomorrows Promise to feed his family and replenish the seeds Tomorrows Promise needed for replanting.

Louis staggered along the trail Tomorrows Promise his modest farmhouse. His feet and muscles rebelled after a gruesome day in Tomorrows Promise unforgiving fields, plowing up the old and rotating for the new golden weed he hoped would produce a better tobacco yield next season. He watched her flour-covered hands disappear into her white apron with rapid strokes down its length.

At that moment, he realized he was at a crossroad. He trotted back to the house and the kitchen table where a spice-filled air replaced the tobacco odor he carried in with him. After pulling a chair out for Ella, he Tomorrows Promise and pressed his cracked lips against her gray-streaked hair amassed in a bun, a true testament to a life hard-lived.

He prayed his only boy had not contracted an illness. Not now. Not their only male child left to carry the family surname. Often in the field he toiled Tomorrows Promise a rage to beat the ache from his heart, but it always Tomorrows Promise beneath his brave demeanor. Once the meal had ended, he dismissed the girls from Tomorrows Promise table and frowned, a seriousness his curious wife noticed with a mirrored look of her own.

He believes it and warned me to prepare. I cannot bear to see you dragged onto the battlefield. You know they will. Ella slammed her fist down, rattling the dishes. I will not bury another loved one. He cultivated his land with greater intensity, letting his angst work for him instead of Tomorrows Promise him. He waged battles of Tomorrows Promise own in his head, placing himself in an army uniform, marching with neighbors, bearing arms. Even though he detested the growing rhetoric splitting the nation, what Tomorrows Promise suspected to be idle talk defeated his optimism when a declaration of vengeance shattered the region.

That night, men gathered in the church where Louis mingled amongst the Tomorrows Promise crowd. While riled farmers raised fists and voiced solidarity, he wove between them like a phantom specter eavesdropping on a private affair, listening to righteous proclamations and irate southerners strengthen their cause. Behind him, Benjamin appeared and whispered in his ear.

Eagerness for war abounds. They are mobilizing troops and predict the battle to be quick and victorious. People will either defend the South or defend their homes. Was anyone Tomorrows Promise intrigued with false arrogance? Where the North had resources, they had inadequate infrastructure on which to rely or support such a bold campaign.

He laughed, disgusted and disenchanted, as his buggy jostled him all the way home. She bolted for the wagon. With a slight huff, he tended to his mare, his conscience traveling unmapped roads. Ella flung herself in Tomorrows Promise of him, demanding his honest reply. I cannot decide alone. In his heart he had made his peace. Ella would resist, but she needed to be strong, to sacrifice what was necessary for their survival. He predicted the future with the greatest precision he could devise, planning the safest path.

Chart their journey like an explorer. Fulfill a destiny of their choosing. Make the painful Tomorrows Promise, no matter the risk. True freedom allowed endless possibilities, and one of those answers dwelled in his soul. But you must agree. Her fingers tightened around his. Our daughters?

Louis snagged wildflowers strangling the picket fence and placed them on Tomorrows Promise graves. Your Tomorrows Promise address will not be published.
