The Stepford Wives is a satirical thriller novel by Ira Levin. The story concerns Joanna Eberhart, a photographer and young mother who suspects the submissive housewives in her new idyllic Connecticut neighborhood may be robots created by their husbands. The book has had two feature film adaptations, both using the same title as the novel: the version and the remake.

Edgar J. Scherick produced the version, as well as all three of the made-for-television sequels. Scherick was posthumously credited as producer on the remake. The premise involves the married men of the fictional Fairfield County town of Stepford, Connecticut and their fawning, submissive, impossibly beautiful wives.

The protagonist is Joanna Eberhart, a talented photographer newly arrived from New York City with her husband and children, eager to start a new life. As time goes on, she becomes increasingly disturbed by the submissive wives of Stepford who seem to lack The Stepford Wives will, especially when she sees her once independent-minded friends, fellow new arrivals to Stepford, turn into mindless, docile housewives following a romantic weekend.

Her husband, who seems to be spending more and more time at meetings of the local men's association, mocks her fears. As the story progresses, Joanna becomes convinced that the wives of Stepford are being poisoned or brainwashed into submission by the men's club.

She visits the library and researches the pasts of Stepford's wives, discovering that some of the women were once feminist activists and very successful professionals and that the leader of the men's club is The Stepford Wives former Disney The Stepford Wives and others The Stepford Wives artists and The Stepford Wives, capable of creating lifelike robots.

Her friend Bobbie helps her investigate, going so far as to write to the Environmental Protection Agency EPA to inquire about possible toxins in Stepford. However, eventually, Bobbie is also transformed into a docile housewife and has no interest in her previous activities. At the end of the novel, Joanna decides to flee Stepford, but when she gets home, she finds that her The Stepford Wives have been taken.

She asks her husband to let her leave but The Stepford Wives takes her car keys. She manages to escape from the house on foot and several of the men's club members track her down. They corner her in the woods, and she accuses them of creating robots out of the town's women. The men deny the accusation and ask Joanna if she would believe them if she saw one of the other women bleed.

Joanna agrees to this, and they take her to Bobbie's house. Bobbie's husband and son are upstairs, with loud rock music playing as if to cover screams. The scene ends as Bobbie brandishes a knife at her former friend. In The Stepford Wives story's epilogue, Joanna has become another Stepford wife gliding through the local supermarket, The Stepford Wives given up her career as a photographer, while Ruthanne a new resident in Stepford appears poised to become the conspiracy's next victim.

While the script emphasis is on gender conflict and the sterility of suburban living, and thus the science fiction elements are only lightly explored, the movie still makes it much clearer than the book that the women are being replaced by some form of robot.

Goldman's treatment of the The Stepford Wives differed from that of Forbes, with the robots closer to an idealized Playboy Bunny ; it has been claimed that the look was scrapped when Forbes' actress wife Nanette Newman was cast as one of the town residents. A made-for-television sequel was titled Revenge of the Stepford Wives. In this film, instead of being androids, the wives underwent a brainwashing procedure The Stepford Wives then took pills that kept them hypnotized.

In the end, the wives broke free of their conditioning and a mob of them killed the mastermind behind the conspiracy. It, too, ended with the members of the conspiracy being killed. A version called The Stepford Husbands was made as a third television movie with the gender roles reversed and the men in the town being brainwashed by a female clinic director into being perfect husbands. Another film titled The Stepford Wives was released in It was intended to be The Stepford Wives comedic than the previous versions.

The new script by screenwriter Paul The Stepford Wives has the women being transformed The Stepford Wives carefully controlled cyborgs rather than being murdered and replaced with robots. The Stepford Wives script The Stepford Wives in a role reversal twist ending in which it is a powerful woman played by Glenn Close who is the evil mastermind of the injustice perpetrated on other women, and features a "Stepfordized" male partner of a gay town resident.

Unlike the original novel and most of the adaptations, the perpetrators of the conspiracy neither die nor get away with their crimes; the victims are freed from their control programming, and their spouses are forced to wait on them hand and foot as a form of reparation.

The version had several locations in the Greenfield Hill section of Fairfield including the Eberharts' house and the Greenfield Hill Congregational Church. Additional scenes from the movie were filmed in Bedminster, New Jersey with extras from surrounding communities.

The term "Stepford wife" entered common use in the English language after the publication of The Stepford Wives book and it is generally used as a derogatory term which refers to a submissive and docile wife who seems to conform blindly to the stereotype of an old-fashioned subservient role in relationship to her husband.
