Praise: 5 Ways to give effective praise to motivate your team

There is no question that all children want and need praise. Children like knowing their parents approve of who they are and what they do. But when a child begins to depend on praise for her total self-esteem, then praise can become a real problem. You can recognize this in your child if he starts asking "Is this good?"

What kind of praise works best? Certainly not comments like "terrific," "wonderful," or "you are the best!" These are like empty calories -- they are easy to grab and instantly gratifying but don't provide real nourishment to a child's self-esteem. Instead you should try to describe your child's behavior or your feeling about a behavior, e. Another good way to raise your child's self-esteem is to ask him reflective questions about his ideas or projects rather than comment on them.

Questions like "What parts of that did you enjoy the most? I have two favorite books that deal Praise Works the issue of praise.

Both provide practical suggestions and models for effective praise and encouragement. Hope this helps! Advice given here is not intended to provide a basis for action in particular circumstances without consideration by Praise Works competent professional. Some people believe that praise has positive Praise Works on a child's self-esteem; others suggest that praise can have unexpected negative results.

I know Praise Works parents can help their children's self-esteem by praising them, but is it good to praise children for everything they do? For Praise Works, when my son shows me a picture he has drawn or a story he has written, should I praise him even if the Praise Works isn't that great? Your question raises a big debate in psychology circles these days. While some people believe that praise can have positive effects on a child's self-esteem, others suggest that praise can have unexpected negative results.

My advice lies somewhere in between. Felice Kaufmann is an independent consultant in gifted child education.
