We all prioritize different things in our lives. The Values deck uses design as a tool to help people better understand themselves and the people they know. Having previously Kickstarted a series of minimalist posters that reduce big philosophical ideas into simple shapes Carreras visualizes these concepts abstractly, one per card, using a simple informational style.

The style of the cards is immediately understandable to anyone who has ever seen a bathroom sign. Carreras tells me that he based his designs off of Isotype visual language created by pioneering informational designers Otto Neurath and Gerd Arntz that is the standard for most pictorial signage on Earth. The project tries to make visible the invisible, something as important as what defines who we are both as individuals and as a society.

They can be flipped through like trading cards, used in exercises, or even hung up as little motivational posters. However, the deck does ship with a few simple game suggestions, like a values-based version of Charades. The cards can also be used as a simple getting-to-know-you exercise, by having two people rank a handful of cards in the order the values represented are important to them, then compare the results.
