In July, the NYT reported the following: "Because Univision has a stranglehold on the main pipeline of telenovelas, from Mexico, the search for programming took Telemundo to Brazil. Sixty to eighty million Brazilians regularly watch evening soap operas, or novelas in Portuguese. We met because Meire lived and worked in the same building where I lived.

She had long, curly hair cabelo anelado [13] that she kept tied in a bun during the time she was working so that it would look less frizzy when she untied it to go out. Meire came from a smaller city situated in the southern region of Minas Gerais. She told me she saw babysitting as a temporary occupation. She wanted to take acting courses and learn about computers. In our conversations, Meire constantly asserted that, in spite of working as a babysitter, she belonged to another, higher class than her colleagues. She told me she came from a well-established family. Her parents could afford to have her stay at home, but she wanted to earn her own money and decided to move to Belo Horizonte, where an elder sister lived and worked.

Meire was very aware of class differentiation. Conversations about her consumption habits and social life were the means through which she marked her social positioning as being different from her colleague babysitters: she always made it clear to me and the other babysitters who were listening that she preferred to buy quality products and clothes, no matter what they cost. When I asked Meire her opinion about why so many people watched telenovelas, she answered: Novelas show so many clothes, and then if people want to open a shop, then they look at the fashion in the novelas and start to sell the same thing. So I think they watch to learn. There are lots of things to learn. And there are also lots of wrong things, too.

As I have previously mentioned, television works as a common reference among Brazilian viewers. It is a means to spread messages and information throughout a country that is fractured by enormous social inequalities. According to Meire, television programs and telenovelas specifically help viewers to gain access to information that is otherwise unequally distributed. Television and the telenovela flow translate unknown situations and milieus into recognizable events and places, offering viewers a cognizable basis for understanding and living within a complex and unequal Brazilian reality. She related to the telenovela flow as an insider—she was acquainted with it and mastered many of its elements. Meire carefully scrutinized the dresses and hairstyles of telenovela characters and actresses and she spoke like an expert about the beauty secrets of telenovelas actresses:

By circulating and appropriating certain commodities similar to the ones displayed in the telenovela flow in her conversations, Meire referred quite often to things and commodities she either planned to acquire or had already acquired, by showing off her expertise about the beauty secrets of actresses and the fashions of this flow, Meire made herself recognizable through her body and clothing style as being someone with a somewhat more privileged socio-economical position Bourdieu By being in constant dialogue with the telenovela flow, Meire appropriated certain legitimated consumption patterns and reiterated them as an effective way of blurring and downplaying her position as a working-poor babysitter.

Meire illustrates the context-bound, shifting, intertextual and interactive process of communication and production of meaning, to which Bakhtin gives the name of dialogism: by interacting with the flow she positions herself socially and negotiates between messages which are themselves embedded with socio-cultural meaning. Something that happened in the elevator earlier that day had upset her.

All the inhabitants of the building could use either of the two elevators, but there were also rules, some explicit and some implicit, governing the utilization of the elevators by non-residents or servants. An explicit rule was that the service elevator should be used to transport things like grocery, furniture, suitcases and the like. A not so explicit rule was that workers, cleaners, maids and nannies as well as people coming from the outside whose errands were not of a social kind—such as electricians, plumbers, food deliverers, should take the service elevator. That day, Meire had taken the social elevator. On her way up, she met a neighbor, a woman in her fifties, who asked Meire if the other elevator was out of function.

On the contrary, she was recognized as someone who had no place among marble and mirrors. Meire got upset. The only difference is that you have money. But, deep inside our bodies, we both stink. Not even how to fry an egg. They depend on other people. He was so rich. Then, once, he got lost in the jungle and he had to eat insects to survive. With all that money! In past conversations with me, she had basically related to it in terms of consumption, appropriating and circulating commodities and opinions that would help her to blur and downplay her low prestige position as a babysitter.

She just kept looking at me. Just like a fool feito boba. Meire relates in two ways to the telenovela flow. First, she turns around and answers to a recurrent interrogation that runs through it—social differences are embodied and naturalized, but consumption focused on the body fashionable clothes, cellular phone, hairstyle can be a way to downplay class and at the same time give access to prestige all the parties to which she was Maria and the Telenovela Flow. The next case study to be examined here illustrates yet another possible way through which viewers engage with the telenovela flow. It is the story of Maria, a fifteen-year-old black girl who came from a small city in northern Minas Gerais, a poor and very dry region, populated by a few rich cattle farmers and great many poor people. Maria had not completed elementary school and she worked as a domestic servant in her hometown. One day, the family for whom she worked was visited by some relatives who lived in Belo Horizonte.

By the end of that same afternoon, she was sitting in a car with people that she barely knew, heading towards a city she had never seen, to live and work with total strangers. Maria told me that a few weeks after her arrival, she wrote a letter to her mother, telling her where she was and what she was doing. She said that her mother wrote back a very angry letter, saying that she was coming to Belo Horizonte to take her home. Maria was full of energy — eager to get a boyfriend, she anticipated with excitement the few occasions when she actually had time off and could go out.

On these occasions, she would let her curl-relaxed hair down and she would put on a roupa de sair party clothes — a mini-skirt and a T-shirt or a tight mini-dress, which showed off her home-made tattoos: a heart on her left thigh and something that looked vaguely like the letter "M" on her arm. While working, she sang, danced and taught all the latest pagode [15] songs to the two-year-old boy she took care of.

After some months in the field, I started interviewing her about her television viewing. Since her working hours were not delimited by a time schedule, Maria worked practically all day long, more or less intensively. It is interesting to notice that in spite of her work she took care of a little boy, but she was also supposed to do some household tasks such as cleaning and washing, she could, with varying degrees of attention, follow the plot of many telenovelas, listen to the radio, and see her favorite bands performing in variety shows. During her first months in Belo Horizonte, she did not know anyone in her age, neither did she know her way around the city. Therefore, she stayed at home a lot. Watching television was her main source of entertainment. Of all the telenovelas she followed, her favorite was Xica da Silva [the story of a black female slave, Xica, historically known to have been the most powerful woman in the state of Minas Gerais on the second-half of the 19th century.

The telenovela was broadcast by Manchete, in \[\ldots\]. When Maria explained to me why she liked the telenovela Xica da Silva, she never explicitly touched upon the subjects of slavery and racism, which other informants thought were central. Just like many of my informants, Maria could comment upon a specially interesting event that took place in a telenovela and then connect this event with a similar situation she had witnessed or experienced without necessarily making explicit the articulation between reality and fiction. Maria was afraid of being fired, because of a quarrel she had had with this old woman. The parallels between this interchange and those that took place between Xica and Violante are striking.

Throughout the telenovela plot, Violante associates race to class and sexuality — she insistently reminds everyone that Xica was her former slave, and she accuses Xica of being an amoral, overly sexual being. At the same time, Violante describes herself as being a wealthy, chaste and white virgin, perfectly eligible for marriage. On the other hand, non-whiteness, sexuality and sensuality can be associated with passion, attraction, warmth, seduction and Brazilianness. Cucu, a white, very self-confident female circus-artist used this expression as a nickname for a dear male friend. To appropriate, circulate and reiterate slang, idiomatic expressions, regionalisms and proper names coming from the telenovela flow is quite a common phenomenon. They finally ended up kissing each other. But what did you see in me? Your woman is white, she has long, straight hair.

Excerpt from fieldnotes. Despite that, and as I have previously pointed out, when commenting events from Xica da Silva, Maria did not touch upon the themes of racism and class differences, nor did she explicitly draw a direct connection between what she saw in the telenovela and what she experienced in everyday life.

She simply jumped back and forth between fictive stories and her own stories, without acknowledging any explicit identification with her favorite character. Were her experiences of racism and subordination so painfully close to the ones in the telenovela that she refused to explicitly recognize them? Instead it should be understood in terms of shame — a feeling that victims of certain kinds of physical or symbolic violence have when they think that they somehow provoked their attackers — blended with a wish to bypass and forget racist experiences, in an effort to protect oneself from emotional pain. Romantic love challenges hierarchies of race and class, but it also seems to spring from racialized notions of sexuality where dark-skinned persons are described as more hot-blooded than white persons, and racialized notions of class, where whiteness is associated with wealth.

He kissed her. Her engagement with the telenovela flow was one means she had to make her own story recognizable, interesting and thrilling, much like a telenovela plot. I proposed the term telenovela flow to describe what viewers were actually relating to. I adopted a dialogical perspective to make sense of that flow, and of how people related to it. I thus emphasized the processes of circulation, appropriation and reiteration of meaning taking place between and between media texts and people. The way viewers turn around and engage with messages coming from the telenovela flow varies extensively and reflects the tensions and contradictions that exist within contemporary Brazil.

It is tethered to particular socio-cultural values. I tried to illustrate that through two ethnographic case studies. Even though the empirical material presented here is also tethered to a Brazilian, urban context, it is my conviction that the theories and methods with which I have engaged can be applied to other contexts of media reception. This initial description serves a second objective, namely to start delineating the relationship between telenovelas and Brazilian society. However, the spread of television technology around the world was intensified only several years after the end of World War II. In Sweden, for instance, the first official television broadcast happened in See for instance Abu-Lughod and Butcher Since I am basically retelling the steps of my Ph.

Audiences, then, are set in relation to a single set of isolated texts which qualify already as categorically distinct objects. Users are cordoned off for study and therefore defined as particular kinds of subjects by virtue of their use not only of a single medium but of a single genre as well. However, her focus lies on the content, not the reception of these programs. After that, I returned to the field for shorter periods generally a month, once a year. Excerpt from an interview: All kinds of prejudice are discussed in Xica. They show how badly the slaves were treated. They were treated like beasts. And almost all the owners had sex with female slaves who had to accept that. It was terrible. Meire: If he wants her? Marina: Really? When did that happen? Meire: Yesterday, at the end of the episode.
Marina: Oh! What about the gays fighting for their rights to live together? Marina [is quiet but shakes her head, disagreeing]. Meire: Take Xuxa [a mega-star in Brazilian media] for instance. Her boyfriend is younger than her. I read this in Caras. He wanted to marry me, but I was only fifteen… then I had another one who was also older than me, and who also wanted to marry me. It was so boring! He was so immature! We could not talk about anything. Marina: Yes, women are more mature than men.

By moving back and forth from fiction to everyday life, these women found the opportunity to tell private stories and express their moral opinions on subjects that were at least apparently related to the ones discussed by the telenovela. The attractiveness of mixed-race and black men, Goldstein suggests, is not valorized to the same extent For a discussion on race mixture, sensuality and Brazilianness, see also DuMattia ; Freyre ; Parker It is through denial that the mechanism of identification is reinforced.

Wade approaches similar questions when he investigates the case of racism and race mixture in Colombia. She examines a particular fantasy that circulated in the everyday conversations among these women — a fantasy of upward mobility or at least of an economic improvement in their lives through the seduction of older, richer, and usually whiter men. She quotes one of them. The history of my grandfather is the following. He left Grandma and went to live with the other woman. He left her with nine children. So she always remained his friend, sent food to him, everything. But Aunt Maria, who was a teenager at the time, never accepted it. No way. She kept crying, saying that he was no good, everything. So the woman died. There was no way. He had to leave there. Daughters never accept the other woman. It has to be either the mother or her. Aba-Lughod, Lila. Being up to date on the current telenovelas is one of the best ways to make small talk with Brazilians, since nearly everyone wants to talk about the latest episode!. Telenovela's are soap operas normally spoken in Spanish and aired in Latin America,although they are similar to British soaps they have distinctive differences such as instead of a story lineing listing a couple of episodes these storylines last nearly a year. A Telenovela, Slavery, and the Diaspora. It was released as a Brazilian soap opera in the USA. Telenovelas are characterized by a continuing melodramatic story line and a permanent cast. Watch Globo from Anywhere! Maria was full of energy — eager to get a boyfriend, she anticipated... with excitement the few occasions when she actually had time off and could go out. On these occasions, she would let her curl-relaxed hair down and she would put on a roupa de sair party clothes — a mini-skirt and a T-shirt or a tight mini-dress, which showed off her home-made tattoos: a heart on her left thigh and something that looked vaguely like the letter "M" on her arm. While working, she sang, danced and taught all the latest pagode [15] songs to the two-year-old boy she took care of. After some months in the field, I started interviewing her about her television viewing. Since her working hours were not delimited by a time schedule, Maria worked practically all day long, more or less intensively.

It is interesting to notice that in spite of her work she took care of a little boy, but she was also supposed to do some household tasks such as cleaning and washing, she could, with varying degrees of attention, follow the plot of many telenovelas, listen to the radio, and see her favorite bands performing in variety shows. During her first months in Belo Horizonte, she did not know anyone in her age, neither did she know her way around the city.

Therefore, she stayed at home a lot. Watching television was her main source of entertainment. Of all the telenovelas she followed, her favorite was Xica da Silva [the story of a black female slave, Xica, historically known to have been the most powerful woman in the state of Minas Gerais on the second-half of the 19th century. The telenovela was broadcast by Manchete, in ]: When Maria explained to me why she liked the telenovela Xica da Silva, she never explicitly touched upon the subjects of slavery and racism, which other informants thought were central. Just like many of my informants, Maria could comment upon a specially interesting event that took place in a telenovela and then connect this event with a similar situation she had witnessed or experienced without necessarily making explicit the articulation between reality and fiction.

Maria was afraid of being fired, because of a quarrel she had had with this old woman. The parallels between this interchange and those that took place between Xica and Violante are striking. Throughout the telenovela plot, Violante associates race to class and sexuality — she insistently reminds everyone that Xica was her former slave, and she accuses Xica of being an amoral, overly sexual beast. At the same time, Violante describes herself as being a wealthy, chaste and white virgin, perfectly eligible for marriage. On the other hand, non-whiteness, sexuality and sensuality can be associated with passion, attraction, warmth, seduction and Brazilianess. Cucu, a white, very self-confident female circus-artist used this expression as a nickname for a dear male friend.

To appropriate, circulate and reiterate slang, idiomatic expressions, regionalisms and proper names coming from the telenovela flow is quite a common phenomenon. They finally ended up kissing each other. But what did you see in me? Your woman is white, she has long, straight hair. Excerpt from fieldnotes. Despite that, and as I have previously pointed out, when commenting events from Xica da Silva, Maria did not touch upon the themes of racism and class differences, nor did she explicitly draw a direct connection between what she saw in the telenovela and what she experienced in everyday life.

Her engagement with the telenovela flow was one means she had to make her own story recognizable, interesting and thrilling, much like a telenovela plot. I proposed the term telenovela flow to describe what viewers were actually relating to. I adopted a dialogical perspective to make sense of that flow, and of how people related to it. I thus emphasized the processes of circulation, appropriation and reiteration of meaning taking place between and betwixt media texts and people. The way viewers turn around and engage with messages coming from the telenovela flow varies extensively and reflects the tensions and contradictions that exist within contemporary Brazil. It is tethered to particular socio-cultural values. I tried to illustrate that through two ethnographic case studies.

Even though the empirical material presented here is also tethered to a Brazilian, urban context, it is my conviction that the theories and methods with which I have engaged can be applied to other contexts of media reception. This initial description serves a second objective, namely to start delineating the relationship between telenovelas and Brazilian society. However, the spread of television technology around the world was intensified only several years after the end of World War II. In Sweden, for instance, the first official television broadcast happened in See for instance Abu-Lughod and Butcher. Since I am basically retelling the steps of my Ph. Audiences, then, are set in relation to a single set of isolated texts which qualify already as categorically distinct objects.

Users are cordoned off for study and therefore defined as particular kinds of subjects by virtue of their use not only of a single medium but of a single genre as well. However, her focus lies on the content, not the reception of these programs. After that, I returned to the field for shorter periods generally a month, once a year. Excerpt from an interview. All kinds of prejudice are discussed in Xica. They show how badly the slaves were treated. They were treated like beasts. And almost all the owners had sex with female slaves who had to accept that. It was terrible. Meire: If he wants her?

Marina: Really? When did that happen? Meire: Yesterday, at the end of the episode. Marina: Oh! What about the guys fighting for their rights to live together? Marina [is quiet but shakes her head, disagreeing]. Meire: Take Xuxa [a mega-star in Brazilian media] for instance. Her boyfriend is younger than her. I read this in Caras. He wanted to marry me, but I was only fifteen... then I had another one who was also older than me, and who also wanted to marry me. It was so boring! He was so immature! We could not talk about anything. Marina: Yes, women are more mature than men. By moving back and forth from fiction to everyday life, these women found the opportunity to tell private stories and express their moral opinions on subjects that were at least apparently related to the ones discussed by the telenovelas. The attractiveness of mixed-race and black men, Goldstein suggests, is not valorized to the same extent For a discussion on race mixture, sensuality and Brazilianness, see also DaMatta; Freyre; Parker. It is through denial that the mechanism of identification is reinforced.
